

Recommended Native Plantings By Vegetative Zone

The Sea Ranch Association
Department of Design, Compliance
& Environmental management

The Sea Ranch includes six vegetation zones, defined below. The plants typical of these zones are the result of the influence of the soils, the proximity to the ocean, the wind strength and direction, the slope of the land, the amount of sun, and the historical influence of humans. Brief descriptions of these zones are given below. As would be expected, there is considerable overlap between the six zones.

Salt Spray

The bluffs at the edge of the ocean are dramatic and fragile. The sea and wind batter them while cypress and other native plants hold them together. Increased runoff and erosion continually threaten the bluffs. Poor drainage management can exacerbate erosion problems, particularly at the bluff edges. Views are often dramatic, ranging from intimate coves and rock outcroppings to sweeping vistas up and down the coast. Owners of lots located near the bluffs have a special responsibility because buildings located here are highly visible from the meadows above and from the bluff trails.

Dune

While the limited areas of dune zone on the northern part of The Sea Ranch is part of the salt spray zone, its soils are mostly sandy and the winds may be stronger. As a result, the vegetation is more limited, while proving a character different from any other part of The Sea Ranch. These areas typically are formed by windblown sand off of beaches.

Lower Terrace

The meadows, just inland from the bluffs, are former grazing lands that are subdivided by the dramatic cypress hedgerows. The landscape between the hedgerows is generally low, with occasional trees and shrubs. Uncontrolled tree and shrub growth can be a management problem. The land gently undulates, so there is considerable visual variety and, like the bluff area, the homes are generally quite visible. Riparian corridors and seasonal streams, some lined with willows, pass through the meadows and are important landscape features that cannot be disturbed. Wetlands act as sponges that absorb runoff from higher elevations. Because vegetation is less dense and landforms are relatively flat, the relationship between houses is most noticeable in the meadows. Therefore, it requires sensitive design work to integrate the structures into the landscape.

Terrace Break

In the transitional zone, on either side of Highway 1, the land form is irregular and often shaped by stream channels. The landscape is varied, with more trees and masses of large native shrubs, such as coffee berry, wax myrtle, ceanothus, and western azalea. The topography is often steeper, providing the opportunity for multilevel houses that respond to the grade changes. It also requires more attention to drainage and grading.

Upper Terrace

While more gently sloping, like the lower terrace, the upper terrace is marked by less ocean influence: warmer and sometimes sunnier in summer, less wind, more and taller trees. Streams with riparian vegetation and penetration by upland forest make this a mixed zone in many places.

Uplands Forest

The hilltop forest zone consists of the hillside ridge as well as forestlands east of the ridge that are not visible from the lower elevations. Some home sites on the ridge have extensive ocean and coastal views. In the reverse view, ridge-top homes are often prominently visible from the lower zones. The coniferous forest areas vary in vegetation density with sites that are open and others that are heavily forested and dark. In some of the densely forested areas, the stream channels are deep and dramatic with a mix of riparian vegetation. Like the transitional zone, the topography is varied and provides both opportunity and additional responsibilities.
